Hospital-based, urban emergency departments (EDs) are increasingly subjected to national, state, and local pressure to implement two-tiered access. Emergency medical services providers are urged to offer a space in a designated hospital-based ED to accept either patients requiring immediate medical intervention or those requiring coordination of urgent and elective care. The aim of this study was to evaluate an existing system which integrates both these care pathways in an urban paediatric ED. A prospective single-centre cohort study was performed on all patients presenting to the ED during three 6-month periods. In the intervention period the emergency medical services (EMS)
