Former Ecuadorian president Rafael Correa called out his country's conservative evangelical movement in a tweet, calling the evangelical group "political" and a "new North American colony." "What happened in Ecuador this week was unprecedented," he said in a tweet on Thursday. "The political independence of the Catholic Church, always the most respected church in the country, was broken." "The political independence of the Catholic Church, always the most respected church in the country, was broken." – Former Ecuadorian President Rafael Correa "For the first time in our history, the governors of the provinces declared the evangelical candidate in a presidential election an electoral evil. For this reason, for the first time in our history, the governors of the provinces declared the evangelical candidate in a presidential election an electoral evil." The statement comes days after three of the 10 gubernatorial candidates in the upcoming Ecuadorean presidential elections called for a boycott of the election, held on December 2, due to the presence of the conservative Catholic group "Coalición Javeriana," or "Javeriana coalition," in the campaign. "Coalición Javeriana has taken an active part in this campaign from the outset," said the candidates, Joaquin Pino of Guayas, Alexander Camacho of Morona Santiago, and Alberto Acosta of Manabi, who also denounced the "persecution" of the candidates. At least seven of the 15 candidates have condemned the campaign of the coalition. The campaign of the coalition is backed by Javeriana University, which controls 18 governorships in the country. The group intends to run candidates in three out of every four provinces, choosing their own slate of candidates in the other provinces. They are also campaigning to be part of the ruling coalition after the elections. Correa, who came to power
